Not illustrated. 1860 Excerpt: .The harp here is a tolerable substitute for the bagpipe, and it is remarkable that the Irish have an inferior imitation of both harp and bagpipe, while the English can boast of no national instrument whatever; nor have they any national music, while the Welsh, Scotch, and Irish each excel in a style of harmony, as peculiar to themselves as their accent in speaking. A few airs perhaps coeval with the days of Ossian, are not quite identified to either country, such as Gramachree Molly, and Robin Adair, which occasion a vehement feud between the bards of these different nations; though it would be difficult to ascertain who first lighted the candle, when each claims the honor of having illuminated the rest. When George IV. visited Scotland, having one day, in a fit of royal courage, actually tasted a haggis, his Majesty wished to say something polite to a Scotch laird, and mentioned that he had dined lately on an excellent dish, a boiled bagpipe! rather light diet certainly--as in that case he must have lived upon air. In a violent dispute some years ago upon the subject of national tunes, a Highland piper, who thought himself triumphant, blew such a blast of music as had not been heard for ages; upon which his enraged opponent seized a carving-knife, and stabbed the bag of the pipes, so that they could be played no more. The harp, however, is not subject to vicissitudes like these, having more...
