Her most implacable enemy was Mme. Joseph: she expressed herself about this th21:7 of Zzfe and sunlig/zt with all the freedom and ardor of youth. She called her by turns, the refractory skeleton, or the fugitive from t/ze pomps of death. Three years after the death of Mme. Letellier, Mlle Lisbeth was more valiarit than ever. There is 6,400 francs that I have paid her! said Planchon one evening. That we may mould away on the north side! was the shrill-voiced response of Mme. Planchon, who was just going up to bed. Then, furious at having to go into her ice-house, as she called it, she gave the opposite door quite a savage kick. As if in echo to the noise her foot had made, a low groan resounded at the bottom of the stairs. It was Joseph, who was taken ill for the third time within the month. They gathered about him, and the swoon lasted only a short time; but next day when he got up he felt shattered. He did not regain his strength. Consumption, which had threatened him for some time, developed itself very distinctly. In vain they nursed him, gave him everything to strengthen him. He failed from day to day. In seeing her son fade away thus, Caroline could not control the feelings of rebellion which took possession of her. At the sight of the old maid, now so thoroughly restored to...
